The Chinese government's recent large-scale capital market stimulus has led to significant increases in the A-shares and H-shares. The professor and representatives from some international investment banks on Wall Street have also traveled to China for on-site research. If all goes well, the professor will return next week and hold a live session to share his experiences and findings from his trip to China.

Yesterday, I introduced the professor's unique "Market Sentiment Analysis" approach. Using this method to view the current stock and crypto markets allows for a deeper understanding of how capital markets operate. In today's market environment, standing out in investments requires an international perspective. Favorable and unfavorable news can impact the market at any time, and in such moments, it's essential to step outside the market itself. Only by viewing it from the outside can you clearly see the big picture, maintain calm, and make more precise judgments.

In this rapidly changing market, calm and rational analysis will be key to your success. Let's learn from the professor's guidance on how to deal with market fluctuations more calmly and achieve steady growth!

As tensions in the Middle East escalate, investor sentiment has been severely impacted, with the Fear Index surging by 15.12%.

Risk appetite has quickly diminished, and the stock market has consequently pulled back. Investors are fleeing risk assets and shifting to safer markets, which has significantly disrupted the upward momentum of the stock market. The effects of this conflict have overshadowed the economic data released on Tuesday, refocusing market attention on technical indicators. A look at the weekly candlestick chart shows that after three consecutive weeks of gains, the market may experience a slight correction this week.

This week's market spotlight is on the non-farm payroll data to be released on Friday. According to recent reports from international investment banks, the job market is slowing, and inflation may still be higher than market expectations. The slowing job market has attracted significant attention from investors, who are closely monitoring signs of economic weakness. According to the latest consumer confidence survey by the Conference Board, 18% of U.S. consumers said in September that finding a job had become more difficult, up from 17% the previous month.

The persistence of inflationary pressures could also have long-term effects on the economy, further complicating expectations for significant rate cuts. With the stock market near historical highs, we need to be more cautious as we enter the fourth quarter, remaining alert to potential risks. In this rapidly changing market, staying vigilant and maintaining rational analysis will be our key strategy moving forward.

As for the current stock trading strategy, as the mentor has analyzed, we should continue focusing on swing trading. Before third-quarter earnings reports are gradually released, it's crucial to be very cautious about stocks at high levels that haven't undergone any adjustments. On the other hand, for stocks that have already experienced significant adjustments, as long as there are no signs of clear deterioration in the company's fundamentals, gradual buying on the dips could be considered. After all, the company remains the same, only the stock price has become cheaper. In the current market environment, value for money is the factor we should focus on the most.

Recently, the most eye-catching trend has been in Chinese concept stocks, which the mentor has repeatedly mentioned as key investment targets. With favorable Chinese market policies gradually being released, these stocks have performed impressively, demonstrating significant investment potential. For such opportunities, investors can use swing trading to navigate market fluctuations while maintaining a focus on long-term value.

Let's continue to closely monitor market trends and, under the mentor's guidance, seize every worthwhile opportunity!

Due to the aggressive fiscal stimulus measures taken by the Chinese government, the A-shares and H-shares have experienced a significant surge within a week. This strong bullish sentiment has also spilled over into the U.S. stock market, especially during China's 7-day National Day holiday. Recently, many Chinese concept stocks have seen gains of over 50%, once again proving the importance of having an international investment mindset. For investors who prefer short-term trading, Chinese concept stocks are undoubtedly one of the top choices worth watching in the near term.

Stocks like TIGR, BILI, and FUTU have seen gains nearing 100%. However, since many investors have limited knowledge of Chinese concept stocks, the mentor suggests participating through index ETFs, which can capture the gains of Chinese stocks while avoiding the risks of individual stock selection. One highly recommended option is YINN (FTSE China 3x Bull ETF), which provides triple market leverage, amplifying the gains and making it one of the best strategies for participating in Chinese stocks at the moment.

ONA COMMUNITY

This approach helps you avoid the risks of picking the wrong stocks while still benefiting from the rise in Chinese concept stocks. Take advantage of this opportunity, use the mentor's strategy, and allocate ETFs wisely to participate in this upward trend!

For investors who are fully invested, a market downturn means risk; but for those with small or no positions, this is an opportunity.

Properly managing your position size is the best strategy to handle market volatility. This week's market correction is actually paving the way for a rebound with the upcoming third-quarter earnings reports.

In contrast, the crypto market continues to experience turbulence. As the chart shows, BTC's movement aligns perfectly with the mentor's Monday analysis, entering a new round of downward adjustments. If you already have a crypto account and shorted BTC on Monday, your profit margin would be quite substantial, potentially gaining around 2,500 points. Compared to stock market fluctuations, the crypto market's volatility is greater, offering higher profit margins. Diversified and international investments are key strategies for consistent future profits.

From the daily candlestick chart of BTC, we can see that the MACD indicator has formed a "death cross" at the top, and the daily K-line closed below the middle line of the Bollinger Bands—typical bearish adjustment signals. The target for the bears may approach $58,000, with the $56,000 level being a solid support zone. This is also an excellent buying opportunity.

ONA COMMUNITY

Combined with positive expectations from the upcoming November presidential election, this dip will provide bulls with the best buying point, bringing the $100,000 target within reach.

For future trends in the crypto market, the mentor's return next week will surely bring more in-depth analysis and valuable insights. Stay tuned!
